May Commentary

We have recently returned from an investment conference in the US. After 2 years of minimal travel it was terrific to be in New York again and to meet companies in person. It is a great way of assessing the US investment landscape and this year was no exception.

Ideally, in our view, all global fund managers should go to the US once a year at least to gain global perspective. The sheer scale of the economy, the energy of the people and the quality of the companies reminds one of the relentless compounding of capital that a capitalist economy inevitably achieves over time.

While this generally remains true the mood this year was noticeably less optimistic than the last time we attended the same event in 2017.

We saw a number of portfolio companies including Coca Cola, Johnson & Johnson and Clorox, as well as a number of companies in our investment universe, which are not in the fund. We also attended a few presentations to round out our overall view of the backdrop.

With the notable exception of Canadian National Railway, "everything is booming", the mood was cautious. Companies are seeing inflation at every level of their operations and are wary of the capital market backdrop as the apparently never-ending era of free money comes to an end.

This is creating an existential recessionary angst perhaps best articulated by Jamie Dimon, the CEO of JP Morgan, with his forecast of a "hurricane". Balanced against this was a view that the US consumer remains strong with money from the COVID stimulus still bolstering demand. With real incomes falling rapidly (currently) this may not last.

Overall the company presentations, while as informative and interesting as ever, did not materially change our view. An investment environment characterised by a less supportive monetary and fiscal policy at a time when commodity prices are rising would be consistent with the above.

Time will tell if we are approaching a slowdown or something more serious. Overall we think the quality of our companies leaves them well placed to continue to operate in a robust manner in a range of scenarios.
